There is a Jewish story about Rabbi Joshua, the son of Levi, who made a trip to Rome in the third century. He was astounded to behold the magnificence of the buildings. He was especially struck by the care lavished upon the painted, marble statues, which were covered with exquisite cloth to protect them from the summer sun. As he was admiring the beauty of Roman art, a beggar plucked at his sleeve and asked for a crust of bread. The rabbi looked at the statues and turned to the beggar and said, "Here are statues of stone covered with expensive clothes. And here is a man, created in the image of God, covered in rags! "A civilization that pays more attention to statues than to human beings shall surely perish."
